R. R. Reidford, representing F. W. Damon; James McLean, representing the McLean estate; W. Wolters and others, Brown, Reidford and Robinson were in favor of concluding the settlement. The others lined up in objection, upon either of the grounds just stated.

Murray was the proponent of the compromise among the supervisors. Low wanted to declare the business off and spend the money for other purposes. Murray won and the matter was left with the ways and means committee, either to effect a settlement or proceed by law to condemnation. Deputy Attorney Milverton had advised both sides that the board had adopted a policy which was to put through this improvement. It only remained to figure out a method to do this as soon as possible. If the county was compelled to bring legal proceedings the city would then compel adjoining property owners to pay on a basis of $21,000 instead of $15,000, the compromise figure.

Now she is a bride of something more than a year's standing, and really ought no longer to be called a bride. But somehow or other, the name clings to her. A little boy has come into the home-nest. And theoretically, the nest shelters now a completely happy family.

But literally, the new mother is looking with bewildered, almost despairing eyes, at the wreck of her home or the close approach of it. She confronts problems which she feels utterly incapable of grappling. And with a sinking sensation about her heart, she feels as if everything will go to smash, before she can avert it.

She was a thoroughly charming girl and a fine pianist. But she knew absolutely nothing about housekeeping. She was so entirely ignorant of it, that she did not even realize its seriousness and importance in the new phase of living she was taking upon herself. She was a motherless girl, the only child, brought up by a housekeeper and an over-fond father. And none of the serious facts of life were ever brought to her attention.

The man she married was in most modest circumstances; in fact, a clerk on a rather slim salary. She married him against her father's wishes; and though there is no direct break between father and daughter, there is a constraint and coolness that holds her back from seeking advice and counsel. Fortunately the young husband is a fine fellow, or probably things would have gone to smash before this.

For, the housekeeping in that little home is beyond words to describe. The husband eventually has settled down to doing the cooking and most of the cleaning. The waste that comes from ignorance is appalling,—when the size of the income is considered. And now that a wee baby has come to be taken care of, the situation is worse.

It all results from the fact that she didn't know what she was undertaking. And when she found the work she had on her hands, there was at first rebellion. She didn't want to give up her music and devote her days to sweeping and washing and cooking. This state of mind has gone by, but she feels helpless in the face of her ignorance. It seems to her things will go to smash before she can learn what she needs to know about running a home happily and economically, and caring for a baby.

Many another bride has found herself in the same situation. And if the situation is eventually saved, much anguish of spirit is endured. And sometimes, the situation isn't saved, and lives are wrecked. Yet it could all be avoided, if brides-to-be would look a few things squarely in the face.

They should recognize that housekeeping if it is done properly is no easy task. They might as well admit it. Right cooking is a scientific proposition. The planning of well-balanced meals is a matter of chemistry. Making income meet expense is as big a financial problem as some that our shrewdest financiers handle. Housekeeping means headwork and handwork. And if the income is limited, it means hard handwork and plenty of it. There is no dodging these facts, and the bride-to-be who wants to be a successful wife should not dodge them.

She ought to decide whether she wants to accept this sort of life. And if she doesn't, then she and her future husband had better talk the matter over and plan other methods of living. The housekeeping problem can be lightened or done away with altogether, if necessary. But to rush ignorantly into it without knowing the work it implies, or how seriously it affects life, is only, with most young wives, to invite disaster.

And this is no mere conjecture. Those who have to do with the renting of small houses in cities have many and various tales to relate of the breaking up of new homes because the wife knows nothing of housekeeping. The house is so mismanaged, or the food is so poor, that the husband can't stand it,—for after all he is only human, or else bills are run up that he can't pay. Finally, there is an explosion, the furniture is sold, she goes home to mother, and there is wreck and devastation where might have been peace and happiness.

And it all comes about through ignorance, through a happy-go-lucky belief that housekeeping is a matter of instinct, and that a girl will take to housekeeping as naturally as a duck to water, and do it as well as the duck performs his feat of swimming. But unfortunately such is not the case. And the girl who expects to go to housekeeping and who knows she is absolutely ignorant of housekeeping, had better take some of the money she intends putting into a parlor-suit and invest it in a course in domestic science; unless she doesn't want the aforesaid parlor-suit to be wet with many a tear, witness many a stormy scene, and perhaps eventually go to the second-hand man.

MRS. POGSON'S PICTURES ATTRACT MANY.

What attracted the eyes of fifty or more persons at the exhibition of Mrs. Pogson's paintings in the Kiloheana Art League rooms yesterday was a mural painting, back of the platform at the rear of the room, representing the grouping of calla lilies, and so natural did they appear that many supposed they were flowers banded for decorative purposes.

Mrs. Pogson, who is island born, handles flowers and fruits with a facility that marks her paintings as of more than ordinary worth from an artistic point of view. Detail is omitted except where it may be used to bring out the quality of the subject and it is never overdone. Take the vase of daisies, either the plain garden variety or the large shasta strain, and there is handling that produces values; the lighting is excellent; the technique as nearly perfect as the most ardent botanist could desire. A touch of nature is in the massing of the rich velvety greens and the higher keyed blooms. Tiger lilies is another notable picture in the collection and two gems are baskets of geraniums. In these the coloring is exquisite and the handling bold and effective. A canvas showing grapes is attractive but to the layman, the coloring is really very transparent, too much so to us of Hawaii whose knowledge of the luscious California whites is gained from observation of the boxes that come from the grocery shop. The drawing in this picture is good and the composition quite equal to any of the floral subjects. Another canvas that attracted the old Honolulu was the basket of vari-colored lels. This, together with the mango and Tiger lilies, Mrs. Pogson has painted since her return to Honolulu, all of which show the touch of the master hand as well as a knowledge of Hawaiian fruits and flowers and the ability to transfer to canvas their peculiar vivid brightness.

OWNERS BLOCK BIG IMPROVEMENT

Efforts at compromise with abutting and adjacent owners in the Hotel street widening scheme failed for the time being at the conference between them and the supervisors last night. The board has $30,000 set aside for the improvement, the cost of which on the basis of accepted claims for damages would be $41,617. According to law betterments of fifty per cent can be assessed. To avoid litigation the supervisors are ready to accept $15,000 instead of $20,000, the estimated legal amount, for betterments as that would cover the difference between the appropriation and the assessed damages, with $4000 or $5000 over for paying the widened portion of the street. But some of the owners assessed for betterments in the plan of settlement claim either that they are assessed too high or that their interest is too remote to be assessed anything.

Owners at the conference were as follows: Cecil Brown, representing the Campbell estate; J. R. Galt, representing the Brewer estate. Hawaiian Trust Company and Aldrich estate; W. W. Chamberlain, representing the Guardian Trust Company; M. P. Robinson, representing the James Robinson estate; A. D. Larnach, representing the Perry estate;

NEW BLOUSES RESEMBLE OLD STYLE DRESSING SACQUES.

Not unlike the neat, tightly fitting dressing sacque of a generation ago is the new peplum blouse which fastens down the center front. But these blouses are decidedly modish and a typical model of batiste and lace is pictured here. The peplum is joined to the blouse at the waistline under a band of embroidery motifs, and similar motifs outline a round yoke of Val lace. The blouse does not actually button down the front, though this effect is suggested, the fastening being at the back in the usual way. The peplum is just short enough to escape being visible beneath the edge of the coat.

seized by four or five of his friends, tied to a board and carried through the streets. Every few moments the hazers dropped Martin to the pavement. He groaned at each drop, but his companions evidently thought he was shamming. Eventually he became dazed, and the other boys cut the rope that bound him to the board and fled. The boys who did the hazing are being protected by their friends, and their names have not been revealed. Martin may die.
